MURILLO

HIS LIFE AND WORK

THE eastern part of Spain—the warlike Catalonia and the fertile Valencia—have always been rich in the talent, but never in the genius, of art. Still less seldom has the central or mountainous region produced any painter of note. If we are to look for the flower of the great Spanish masters in art, we shall find them in the sunny south, in bright and happy Andalusia. And if we are seeking for one in whom, more than in any other, this Andalusian spirit is embodied, we shall find him in Murillo.

Both on his father's and his mother's side, Bartolome Esteban Murillo came from a family long settled in Andalusia. We are ignorant of the exact date of his birth, but we know that he was baptized on Monday, January 1, 1618, in the Church of St. Magdalena, in Seville, as the son of Gaspar Esteban Murillo and Maria Perez. Murillo's father died, probably in 1627, and his mother on January 8, 1628; so that already at the age of ten Murillo was an orphan. His guardian, the surgeon Juan Augustin Lazares, married to Anna Murillo, took the boy under his care, and, because of his aptitude for drawing, sent him to study with Juan del Castillo. This artist, though he came from a high, artistic Sevillian family, was a painter of small attainments. Still, he was a good teacher, accomplished in draughtsmanship and composition and, as his religious paintings show, a genuine Sevillian in his lively and graceful expression. He belonged to that company of later Spanish romanticists who imitated the great Italian masters, and who, without ever having been in Italy, copied their works from etchings and engravings. In this respect, Castillo was a follower of his contemporary, Juan de Ruelas, who must be considered as the founder of the national Sevillian art of the seventeenth century. It is evident, from the earliest extant works by Murillo, that the young artist, like many of his contemporaries, had been an earnest student of the paintings by Ruelas; more especially during the years following 1639, when Castillo had left Seville to take up his residence in Cadiz.

Without his parents to help him, and without the sympathetic teaching and companionship of his master, Murillo, in 1639, was thrown on his own resources. He was very poor, practically penniless, and could not, however much he may have desired it, afford the expense of attending the School of Zurbaran, the chief painter of his native town. He turned, therefore, for a living to the making of pictures for selling at the " ferria " or public fairs in Seville. These fairs were a market for everything that was cheap and shoddy, more especially for daubs by street painters who here readily disposed, for very small sums, of their wretched pictures of saints and Madonnas which were sent to South America and Mexico to be bought there by the new converts to Christianity. Murillo offered his wares with the rest, and managed in this way to make a scant livelihood. In 1642, however, moved by the improvement he had seen in the work of a brother-artist, Pedro de Moya, who had returned from a visit to the Netherlands, Murillo made up his mind to do likewise, and to go to Flanders or Italy for further study. With this purpose in mind, he purchased a quantity of canvas, cut it up into pieces of various sizes, and covered them with paintings. Armed with these he went to the various dealers and disposed of them for such sums as he could obtain. In this manner he collected what he thought would be enough money to enable him to make his journey. He set out for Madrid on foot, and called on his fellow-townsman, Velasquez, then in the height of his fame, to beg from him some letters of introduction to artists in Rome.

Velasquez became greatly interested in the young aspirant, took him into his house and obtained for him permission to work in the galleries of the Spanish capital. Murillo eagerly availed himself of this privilege, and very quickly realized the value of it to him. He studied the works of Titian, Rubens and Van Dyck with all the passion of youthful enthusiasm, and it is to this study, no doubt, that Murillo owes the cultivation of his sense for color in plastic expression. The influence of these great masters is very evident in many of his paintings. But the artist who made the strongest impression on the young student was Ribera, and the influence of this Spanish master is even more marked in the best work Murillo himself achieved. He remained in Madrid, copying the paintings of Ribera, Velasquez and Van Dyck, for two years. The outcome of these drudging, apprenticeship days, may be seen in the first large compositions of his own which he executed for the little monastery of St. Francis, on his return to Seville in 1645 and 1646. The eleven canvases, depicting the legends of St. Francis, were so carefully treasured by the monks of the place that they were shown only on festival days, and then from between hanging draperies. These paintings are all now scattered in the public and private galleries of Europe and America. The first of these paintings to be completed was, probably, "The Vision of St. Francis," now in the Academy of Madrid. The "Angel-Kitchen," in the Louvre, which testifies both to Murillo's power for narrative and his dexterity as a painter of "still life," was strongly influenced by the work of Ruelas. The famous representations of the lives of the holy monks—"St. Gil before Pope Gregory IX" and "St. Diego before the Crucifix"—are closely related to the style and manner of Zurbaran. But of all these paintings the most interesting and also the most personal is the "St. Diego feeding the Poor." Murillo never surpassed the healthy freshness and the fine, natural humor of the saint who is here shown as receiving the thanks of the poor people for his charity. Three other paintings belong to this series: "The Monk robbed by a Brigand" (in the possession of M. Ch. Baudet in Le Havre), "The Return of St. Philip" (sold in 1867 at the Soult Sale to a M. de Guitant), and "The Exorcising of the Plague" (in the possession of Duke di Pozzo di Borgo, in Paris). Of these we are unable, unfortunately, to give reproductions in this volume.

The monks of the monastery of St. Francis, when they commissioned Murillo to decorate the walls of their cloister, chose him out of their necessity. They were a poor brotherhood and could not afford to employ the better-known masters of the day. Murillo also was poor, and when he offered his services, there is no doubt he was ready and even eagerly willing to accept any compensation, provided an opportunity was given him to make a bid for fame. What the money reward was we can guess, but the fame was more than Murillo could possibly have anticipated. From that time on the rich of Seville were lavish in their patronage as well as their praise; and the beginning of Murillo's great popularity really dates from the time of the completion of these eleven paintings for the little Franciscan monastery. In May, 1646, Murillo married Dona Beatriz de Cabrera y Sotomayer, who, in 1648, bore him a daughter, Isabel Francesca, who later entered the Dominican Convent of the Holy Mother. At the baptism of his eldest son, Gabriel Esteban, the distinguished Sevillian and famous knight of Calatrava, Don Miguel de Mañara, stood as godfather. In years to come, this Don Miguel was one of Murillo's most munificent patrons. In 1661 was born Murillo's second son, Gaspar Esteban, who later emigrated to America and died there.

Between 1650 and 1660 Murillo executed several of his masterpieces which evince his genius as a colorist, and display his accomplished ability in composition. Among these are to be specially noted the "St. Isidor" and the "St. Leander," a commission from the Archdeacon of Carmona, Don Juan Federigui, for the Cathedral of Seville, where they still hang. "The Nativity of the Virgin," also painted during this period for the Chapter of the Cathedral, is considered to be one of the most pleasing examples of Murillo's so-called "warm" style. In March, 1656, the authorities of the Chapter of the Cathedral gave out that they desired a great altarpiece for the Chapel of St. Anthony, to be painted by "the best artist of the city." There was but one man who could lay claim to such a title, and that man was Murillo. He was given the order by general consent, and on the 21st of November of the same year his gigantic canvas was hung. For this tremendous work Murillo received the sum of 10,000 reals, about $520. It is one of his most widely known paintings, and may still be seen in the Baptistry of the Cathedral of Seville.

Murillo, at this time, interested himself keenly in founding an Academy of Arts for his native town. He succeeded in his efforts, and the institution was opened in 1660. Murillo's great reputation and wide popularity assured him of the presidency of the organization; but he held the office for one year only. Owing to the jealousy and malevolence of his rival, Valdes Leal, he withdrew his name for re-election. But this did not prevent him from continuing to give the school the benefit of his counsel and instruction.

In 1665 Murillo undertook to complete a series of paintings designed by his friend and patron, Canon Don Justino de Neve, for the decoration of the Church of S. Maria la Blanca, the building of which had been finished in 1659. The fourth of these paintings, an allegory of youth, is now in the possession of Mr. Lyne Stephens, of Lynford Hall, Norfolk, England. All these works are among the artist's happiest and most impressive creations. The two which tell the history of the Festival of Our Lady of the Snow, are now in Madrid, but they found their way there only after many vicissitudes of fortune. Marshal Soult, who carried away with him the paintings in the little monastery of St. Francis, robbed the Church of S. Maria la Blanca of its treasures also. "The Virgin of the Conception," another of this series, is now in the Louvre.

The years 1667 and 1668 were the most industrious years of Murillo's life, so far as his work for the Cathedral of Seville was concerned. He restored the allegorical paintings which Pablo de Cespedo of Cordova had some eighty years before executed. He decorated the Chapter Hall with a distinguished "Conception" and with medallion portraits of the patron Saints Leander, Isidor, Hermengild, Pius, Laureanus, Ferdinand, Justa and Rufina. At this time, also, he painted the "Baptism of Christ," which is to be seen over his famous great St. Anthony painting in the Baptistry of the Cathedral. With Juan de Valdes Leal he was employed on the decoration of the Cathedral, in 1671, for the occasion of the canonization of the saintly King Ferdinand III. For this same occasion he painted the portrait of the King, which is now in the Elkins Collection in New York.

On April 12, 1665, Murillo's name had been before the Chapter as a candidate for membership in the most select and distinguished Brotherhood of Seville, the Hermandad de la Caridad. He was elected on June 4, in the same year. Of this pious Brotherhood or Guild, Don Miguel de Mañara, the knight who had stood godfather to the artist's eldest son, was also a member. This noble gentleman had, in 1661, retired from the world to give himself up to a life of holiness and charity, by way of atonement for his previous life of profligacy. Don Miguel determined to restore the buildings of the Hospital or Hermandad de la Caridad, and, with this purpose in view, he went about collecting funds. He succeeded in obtaining sufficient money to warrant him in giving Murillo the commission for painting eleven pictures for the decoration of the Chapel of the Brotherhood. On this commission the artist worked industriously during the years between 1671 and 1674. These eleven paintings are among the best-known of Murillo's works. For this great labor Murillo received the sum of $4,000—a large amount of money when compared with the $520 he had been paid for the St. Francis paintings. The series picture scenes from the Old and New Testaments, with the intent of furnishing special examples of deeds of charity and beneficence. Eight of these eleven are now considered to be the masterpieces of Murillo. These are: "Moses Striking the Rock," the "Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes," both of which are still in the church; the "St. Peter released from Prison," which is in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg; the "Healing of the Sick," now in the Orwell Park Collection, England; "St. Elizabeth of Hungary," in the Prado; "The Return of the Prodigal Son," in Stafford House, London; and the "Tobias," which is now lost. The other three, namely, the "Annunciation," "Infant Jesus" and "Infant John" hang over the altars of the church. Murillo also decorated the façade of the Hospital with five large tiles which were made from designs furnished by him.

Murillo had no sooner finished the work for the Hospital de la Caridad, than he accepted a still more important commission. This was for the execution of eighteen paintings for the High Altar of the Church and the smaller altars of the Chapels of the Convent of the Capuchins. Most of these to-day decorate the walls of the Museum of Seville. The great altar-piece is now in the Walraff-Richartz Museum in Cologne. The "St. Michael" is lost, but there exists a copy of it in the monastery of the Capuchins in Cadiz, from the hand of Meneses Osorio, which gives a good idea of the original. The painting known as the "Charity of St. Thomas of Villanueva" is said to be the one for which Murillo had a special affection—he called it "his own." The little painting known as the "Virgin of the Napkin," is believed to have been painted on a serviette and presented to the cook of the Capuchinian Convent by Murillo as a memorial of himself. It is a charming work.

These were the most prolific years of the artist's remarkable life and career. His aboundingly rich fancy and creative genius seemed as if they grew in fecundity and power with the increase in the demands made on them. When the end did come, it came suddenly and quite unexpectedly and fortuitously. To the year 1678 belong the series of paintings Murillo executed for the Augustinian Monastery of the Hospital of the Brotherhood of the Venerable Holy Ones. Among these is the famous "Mystery of the Immaculate Conception," known as the "Soult Conception," and now in the Louvre. He also undertook a great altar-piece for the Capuchin Church of Cadiz. It was while engaged on the painting of the "Espousal of St. Catherine" for this church that Murillo slipped from the scaffolding and fell, injuring himself so severely that he never recovered from the accident. He died at five o'clock of the evening of the third of April, 1682, in the arms of his friend and pupil, the Chevalier Padro Nunez de Villavicencio. His body was placed on the following day in the chapel of the Church of S. Cruz, which belonged to the family of Hernando de Jaen. Over the altar in this chapel hung at that time the "Crucifixion" by Pedro de Campana, a work for which Murillo had always shown a profound admiration. It is related that he was once found standing before this painting in silent and reverent contemplation. When he was asked what he was doing he answered: " I am waiting until the saints have brought down the body of our Lord."

Murillo was a Sevillano of Sevillanos. He was that in the whole outlook of his mind, and in his religious sentiments, as both these are seen expressed in the forms of his art. In Seville, more than in any other part of Andalusia, the people crowd and jostle each other in dramatic play. It is this drama of the common folk which is to be seen in Murillo's works. His paintings picture the natural gaiety of the natives and their delight in mere living. They reveal the sweet kindness and liveliness of their character, and give it a truly lyrical expression. Murillo's own nature was of this quality, and it is revealed to us not only in his genre paintings, but in his masterpieces of religious sentiment which but seldom portray the suffering of the Saviour. The subjects most dear to Murillo are those which tell of the joy of parents in the family life, the motherly love of the Madonna, the sweet charity of the bread-giving St. Thomas of Villanueva, the heavenly mildness and pious faith of the " Christ on the Cross," where St. Francis is seen embracing the Crucifix and accepting it as his most precious possession. Here, in these appealing works, we find Murillo the lover of humanity. In his visions of the Saints and in his many " Conceptions " we meet with Murillo, the knight and the man of chivalry, who has here embodied the noblest reaches of his mind as an expression of his homage to woman. This man's religion was not composed of dogmas or doctrines. This artist is no theologian. He is simply a man of loving-kindness, for whom religion is the expression of his own pious and beneficent spirit. In every one of his works Murillo, the Sevillano, is giving expression to himself. His Madonnas, his Child Christ, his saints, were taken direct from the people of his native city. He met them in his walks along the shadow-painted streets and in the sunny squares. He knew them and took them to be as good and as kind as he was himself. The Madonna in the Corsini Gallery at Rome, known as the " Gipsy Madonna "; " The Ascension " and " Conception " in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg, the " Conception " in the Chapter Hall of the Cathedral at Seville, the delicate types of the old mendicant monks in his portraits of St. Francis of Paula and St. Felix of Cantalico, all the men and women of these paintings might be seen any day in Murillo's time, and even any day in our own time, walking the streets of Seville. It is this that is so appealing and drawing in Murillo's art.

Murillo's paintings have been classified, according to their styles, into the cold, the warm, and the misty or vapory. Each of these styles probably represents a period of development in the artist's growth; but all his paintings are more or less characterized by one or a combination of all of these styles. All evince a masterly accomplishment in technique and a remarkable ability in composition—especially in the composition of groups of figures. His subjects are either taken from real life or he found the material in the Bible. The realism of his scenes from life, while they are filled with a natural atmosphere, are yet devoid of a profound spiritual appreciation of the life depicted. It is a superficial relationship that is expressed in them. And this limitation is also evident in his religious paintings where the idealism embodied is of a commonplace character and often degraded by a cheap sentiment. Yet both idealism and sentiment are almost always raised in our appreciation by a lyrical quality which is delightful and charming. Here are the qualities which account for Murillo's popularity. He appeals immediately, without the necessity for an interpreter. His art evinces no mystery, no strangeness, no untowardness. The artist has had no visions, and has no revelations to make. He has tales to tell, and as a teller of tales he has few, if any, to equal him in these his almost ravishing stories.

It is well to remember that Murillo came of ordinary stock—his parents were poor working people close to the hard and harsh conditions of life. He himself had known poverty and grinding want and, fortunately both for the man and his art, had never waxed fat enough with wealth to kick—Providence and fortune remained always deities to be revered. To such a man the highest reaches of the imagination take forms such as are pleasing, comforting and kindly. The opposite of an ugly and hard world is a beautiful heaven where compassionate and beneficent saints solicit God's grace on behalf of the poor and distressed. The world is cruel, unkind and filled with the misery of poverty. Murillo's paintings in the Dulwich Gallery realize how keenly the artist felt this. The scenes of low life there pictured are redolent of nothing but sordid wretchedness and squalor. But over against this kind of a world is the heaven of which religion speaks to us. Right to the other extreme, then, swings the pendulum of the artist's temper, and here he sees everything that is lovely, charming, delight-giving and radiant with sensuous beauty. Here also he shows us the deeply religious nature of the man for whom his faith in Catholicism was an abiding comfort and stay.

Murillo was not only a painter by profession, but he was also a painter by conviction. His art was to him almost a religion. He fully understood its value as a means of speech to the people, and its influence as an inspiring voice. It was this that urged him so enthusiastically to found the Academy where poor artists could be taught without charge. He himself taught in it and took no remuneration for his services; and it was his enthusiasm which kept the institution alive, for it died with his death.

With all his shortcomings, Murillo was a great plastic artist—one among the greatest. As a colorist he has had few equals. If, at times, his works smack of insipidity and sentimentality, at times more often, they breathe a spirit that is tenderly touching with, occasionally, a strength that is almost stunning. It is scarcely to be wondered at that his paintings should have appealed so deeply to his own people; for they speak a language all could understand. Nor need we be surprised that the people of Spain should esteem them so highly as to treasure them as though they were sacred relics.
